Estrada: I can run again for president
Says plan backed by 'legal study'

by CHRISTIAN V. ESGUERRA & FE ZAMORRA
Inquirer.net

SAYING the people, not the courts, are the "final arbiter" on whether he could run again for president, Joseph Estrada has come out brandishing a "legal study" supporting his view that voters may send him back to Malacañang.

Quoting the study, the deposed leader maintained that the constitutional ban on the reelection of chief executives applied to "sitting presidents" and not to a former president like him who wasn't even able to finish his term.

"The ban was intended for sitting presidents, so they will not use the vast resources to stay in power. I am not a sitting president. I am not seeking reelection, I am running again," Estrada said.

He said he commissioned the study to determine his eligibility for the 2010 presidential race should the opposition fail to unite behind a single candidate.

And so far, he said, "what is getting clear to me is that the opposition is 90-percent sure it will not unite behind one candidate."

'No Take 2'

But the response from the current Palace occupants was stern: No "Take 2" for the actor-turned-political kingpin.

The government's chief lawyer said Estrada may no longer take another crack for the presidency because he had already run—and had been elected—for the same post.

Devanadera recalled that during discussions leading to Estrada's pardon in 2007, he himself publicly "broached the idea" of him no longer running for president. This was followed by more "assurances" coming from Estrada's emissaries, she said.

Asked what she thought could be the reason for Estrada's turnaround two years later, the government counsel said: "A politician gets a different feeling during election season. I would say it's a natural reaction from a politician." ■
