California to introduce digital…

hundreds of millions of dollars.

"The average textbook costs up to $100. So think about it, if each of California's two million high school students use digital math and science books, that would mean that you could save the schools $300 to $400 million and that's money that could be used for hiring more teachers or to make class sizes smaller," he said.

According to Schwarzenegger, California is the first state in the United States to introduce this kind of initiative.

He expects that there will be opponents of the initiative.

But he said that the state is lacking money and this is "a way to save money and provide those same services in education but for less money."

"I know this is, of course, a dramatic shift from the status quo and there is some resistance in some cases," said Schwarzenegger. "But I feel that this is the wrong time now to hold onto the status quo, because this is one of the worst economic and financial crises that the state has been in since the Great Depression."

"This is not at all kind of compensating for, or overcoming our budget crisis or the money that has been taken from the schools, not by any means," he added. "But it does help and this is what we want to do. So this is where the bottom line is, that digital textbooks will help." ■
